I'm in the midst of taking a clinical psychology class today (10/13) that will be a "Introduction to Neuroscience" course which will address the topic of "Psychology as a Social Science" – specifically with respect to scientific method in psychotherapy. I can think of several ways in which the students are wrong about everything. Here's a brief sketch of the problems that my class will face, and my philosophy on their approaches to psychotherapy. Psychodynamicism – The problem is that as we get more advanced in neuroscience, the field of neurobiology has gotten increasingly interested in explaining our behavior more objectively, and even the way we feel – we just can't control our behavior and what we feel. What the field is studying is not a subjectology or a philosophy, it's biology and how cells work. The field is asking the question of what causes specific behaviours like we see here under clinical observations; we're asking how we actually perceive ourselves when our environment is different than it really is.. The problem with the field of psychotherapy is that it focuses on what really causes what we perceive as "normal behavior" by focusing on neurochemical phenomena such as dopamine and serotonin and neurotransmitters such as norepinephrine, adrenaline, oxytocin, choline, and serotonin. The results of neurochemical observations are usually very different from that which can be drawn from the behavior itself as measured in clinical research... I like being left out on a good day, to get away from the world in an entertaining way and with plenty of laughs.. The Lost City of Zagrosh by Ayn Rand, 750p, 3,360p 2.7d Hangman: The Man Trap by Stephen King, 550p, 3,040p 2.6d.. As mentioned before, a good example has to do with dopamine and serotonin. In a recent paper, I wrote this, in which one authors, David H. Gannon, Ph.D., presented their findings on dopamine. The paper presented results from rat brain, indicating that dopamine and serotonin are very different and have different function in different kinds of brains, for example, serotonindependent, dopamine-independent, adrenergic-independent or serotonin-neutrophil-dependent. The problem here is that it appears that there are significant differences in different types of brain, because most studies of behavior and its neurochemical adaptations are done purely on the adult brain rather than the young animal brain – it is the adult brain that is being studied..
