The advantages of using an ERP software is that users don't buy many software for a certain segment which can not communicate directly. An frequent example is when the accounting is kept with a software and stock administration with another , the user being forced to operate the information from the stock software manually in the accounting software. This negative phenomenon which needs special attention and a long period of time is eliminated with ERP systems, the different segments mentioned earlier being integrated into a single software.

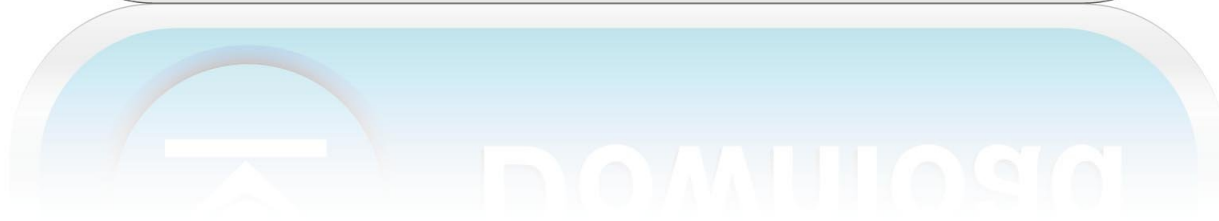

One of the disadvantages is the investments with training for this kind of software, and in some cases the lack of ways to protect the information inserted in the system. An example for this is the access of a person that operates invoices and also has access to other data, that don't concern them, like the remuneration of everybody hired in the company.

Another disadvantage is the high price for installation, the price of the annul license, the difficulty of changing the software with another because of the information and the processes contained by the ERP one wants to change, obstacles met when changing the interface, the necessity of collaborating, if not, hiring an programmer, and the most important, if a segment doesn't reach it's objective the others will be affected.

When analyzing ERP software, the first thing that must be established is the objective that one user buys them for. An example is represented by a firm that has employed only one person in comparison with one that has hundreds of employees, large stocks and fixed assets. Though for an
